

C. Questionnaires using the portrait format (type 2)(one or more pages of questions for each individual)

This portrait format provides the most ample space for both the questions responses to them. Often, the whole set of individual questions (as opposed to the household questions) are contained in a couple of pages for each individual. Few developing countries adopt this format due to cost considerations, but there are an increasing number of them. The examples of the block of economic questions presented are from Argentina, 2001; The Bahamas, 2000; Belize, 2000; Jamaica, 2001; Mexico, 2000; and Zambia, 2000.

Argentina, 2000: There are 13 questions dealing with economic characteristics; the first four are on activity status, employment, and unemployment. The next three cover industry and occupation (two questions). Status in employment and institutional sector are covered in three questions, and of the remaining questions, two deal with retirement benefits and the last covers the size of the establishment (with respect to the number of employees that it has).

The Bahamas, 2000: the 13 questions are presented in the section that deals with economic characteristics, and in addition a question in a separate section that deals with amount and sources of income. The first two questions deal with activity status and unemployment. These are followed by a question on multiple jobs and hours worked; and all these questions were in reference to the past week. The next four questions are on activity status and number of weeks worked in a twelve-month reference period. Another three questions are on industry (two questions) and occupation. Status in employment and a question on “informal trade” are the next set.

Belize, 2000: The questionnaire contains 17 questions (and sub-questions) on economic characteristics. The first seven questions deal with activity status, including one on hours worked, and another on reasons for non-economic activity. Five other questions deal with occupation and industry (present and previous for those currently unemployed), and the address of the place of work. Two questions cover present and previous status in employment, and the last two are on income.

Jamaica, 2001: The first four questions of the set of 20 questions cover activity status and the fifth is on hours worked. Status in employment, occupation and industry take up the next three, with the following two covering place of work. The size (employment) and names of the establishment take up two questions, and are followed by a question on income and one on the last employment held by the non-economically active. Two questions cover usual activity status (twelve-month reference period), and two more deal with permanent layoffs. The two last questions are on types of benefits from work. This questionnaire was administered to a 10 per cent sample of the census population.

Mexico, 2000: The nine economic characteristics questions presented in the questionnaire are broken down as follows: three on activity status, a pair on occupation, one on status in employment, another pair on industry and the final one on income.

Zambia, 2000: There are five questions, one on current activity status (one-week reference period) and another on usual activity status (twelve-month reference period). The three remaining questions cover status in employment, occupation and industry in the twelve-month reference period.
