<td>Session 3. Round table discussion: fostering collaboration between state and non-state partners (we need a culture shift)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>The session is a round-table discussion that covers strategies to foster collaboration between different communities, including the national statistical offices, the civil society organizations and the research community. The discussion aims to review challenges for data from CSOs and non-state organizations to be better utilized by the official data producers, including as they relate to legislative aspects; and to identify concrete steps that could be taken to build collaboration and mechanisms for data sharing.</td>

<td>Session 5. Overcoming the data quality challenge</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>Various data quality issues were raised for citizen-generated data: including (a) the incoherent use or lack of use of statistical concepts; (b) selection bias; (c) lack of information about how the data are being produced; and (d) lack of understanding of the overall data quality. Beyond the actual quality issues, the challenge may present as a lack of trust (by NSOs and scientists) in the quality of citizen-generated data. The session shares national experiences in overcoming challenges in data quality, including (a) aligning non-state data quality with official statistics quality standard; and (b) the use of a quality framework that ensures data meet certain standards that are fit-for-purpose. The session will also cover the potential differences in quality standards between the official and non-official data; what fit-for-purpose means for quality and how to balance between maximizing the use of citizen data and quality considerations.</td>

| 14:10 – 15:40| Session 6. Fostering an enabling environment for more engagement with citizens at the national and international level – what to do next? (Round table discussion)

The session discusses action points that would help provide an enabling environment for more engagement with citizens, at the national and international level. The session covers what needs to be done to address concerns and challenges raised in earlier sessions such as the lack of a common framework on citizen data, lack of trust, data quality and the lack of capacity to foster the collaboration among different communities.

Moderator: Papa Seck, UN Women
Panelists:
- Nguyen Thi Thanh Mai, General Statistics Office, Viet Nam
- Linh Phuong Nguyen, Management and Sustainable Development Institute (MSD), Viet Nam
- Cara Williams, Statistics Canada
- Peter Koblowsky, International Civil Society Centre
- Maki Arakaki, Ministry of Internal Affairs and Communications, Government of Japan
- Racheal Beaven, ESCAP Statistics Division
